Note: For more on the different elements of image editing, see our beginners' guide to Photoshop. Automatic image straightening You can do some minor automatic straightening with the Enhance tab in Photoshop's Tools panel, but you will want to use the Photoshop Lens Correction filter for more realistic straightening and distortion. This filter, found in Photoshop's Filter menu (File > Filter > Photoshop Lens Correction...), can apply different lens distortion to an image. You'll be able to achieve much better results by applying it to images at the browser layer level. Creating layers To support the layer-based editing system of Photoshop, you'll need to create a new layer for every new object in the image. Layers enable you to apply filters, blend and fade, and move and rotate your image without having to redraw or redo the edits. To create a layer, open the new layer in the Layers panel by clicking on the Create a New Layer button in the panel's bottom left. With the new layer active, you can do the following: Layer > Merge Down command To move your layer to the bottom of the stack, simply click on Merge Down from the Layer menu and your layer moves down. To move the layer to the bottom of the stack with a single click, press the Enter (Return) key on your keyboard. You can also perform all the other usual layer commands, such as move, rotate, blur, and so on. Tracing an object's shape When you have a hard corner or line in your image, you'll need to draw the shape precisely. It's easier to trace an object's shape if you convert it to a vector shape by selecting it and pressing the control-click (control-click) key. Vector shapes are more precise than raster (bitmap) shapes, so you'll need to do this before you erase unwanted pixels in any edits. The easiest way to perform a shape trace is to select the object in the Layers panel and then drag it from the Select menu to the Trace menu. Drag your cursor in a way that follows the shape you're trying to trace. If you're using a Mac, you'll need to double-click with your mouse on the object's selection to begin tracing (or use the Shift key to pause the movement of the cursor). You can use the Zoom tool to zoom into the image area and focus on the object. Once Histological and immunocytochemical characterization of liver metastases in patients with colon carcinoma. To quantify histologically and immunocytochemically the appearance of liver metastases from colorectal cancer as well as to analyse whether primary tumour location, stage and differentiation is of prognostic importance. Fifteen colorectal liver metastases of 11 patients were analysed at a total of 23 time points of metastases. Formalin-fixed, paraffin-embedded tissue of liver metastases was stained immunohistochemically for Ki-67, and was analysed by means of a computerized image analysing system. The expression of E-cadherin, alpha-catenin, beta-catenin, and p120-catenin in the primary tumour and in the liver metastases was evaluated by a double-labelling immunohistochemical method. Histological re-appearance of metastases was found at an average of 40 days after primary resection of the tumour. A marked variation was found in the Ki-67 labelling index in metastases, independent of whether they were primary or secondary. Strong E-cadherin expression was found in metastases that have regrown histologically to a significantly lower degree than metastases with absent to weak E-cadherin expression. A high E-cadherin expression in liver metastases of colorectal carcinomas might be of prognostic importance. There was a significantly higher expression of alpha-catenin in metastases with absent to weak E-cadherin expression compared to metastases with strong E-cadherin expression. There were no differences between the expression of beta-catenin or p120-catenin in liver metastases, independent of their regrowth after primary resection of the colon carcinoma. - 5 + 2 3 = - 2 * c .
